

Percy Harrison Fawcett

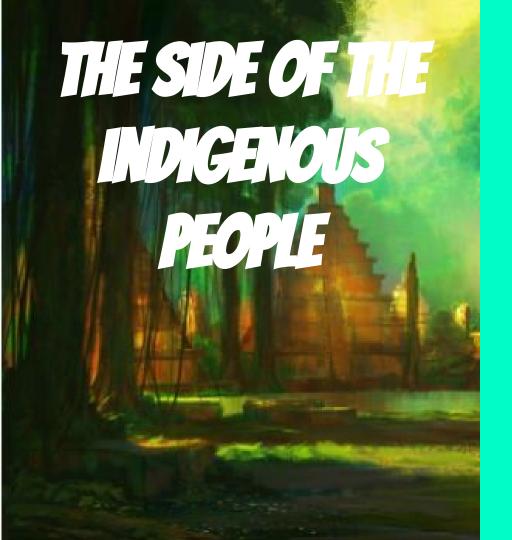

Percy Fawcett was curious and wanted to gain new knowledge about civilizations and wildlife. His first expedition was to map a jungle area at the border of Brazil and Bolivia in South America for the Royal Geographical Society and claimed to see mysterious animals. No one believed him. So he went back to study wildlife and found information on the 'lost city' that he named 'Z'. He went on another expedition to find it.

THERE ARE TWO SIDES TO EVERY STORY

- I tried to treat the Indians with kindness but in return they tried to kill us!
- I never thought that they would be scared of us!
- I had an Idea that we could sing a song to show that we would not kill them.
- Soon the shooting stopped!
- I came over to the Indians and greeted them.
- We exchanged gifts with them.

- They are strangers with guns and strangers are not to be trusted especially people with guns, they could enslave us or even kill us!
- We heard singing from the strangers and decided to stop shooting.
- We talked to a stranger called Percy Harrison Fawcett.
- We gave them gifts and got some strange gifts back.

- He mapped areas so people can explore them more easily.
- Europeans were introduced to new land and wildlife.

 More people explored the areas because of his maps.

I support the central idea that exploration brought about many changes which can be seen from different perspectives.

Stories are normally not told by the side of the indigenous people they are nearly always told by the settlers/explorers. The indigenous talked about their country being treated poorly and they lacked resources because the Europeans stole most of them , they were scared and the Europeans killed many people. But we only know this because some stories are written in both perspectives. That is the only way that we know what the indigenous people thought. Do you support the central idea?
